The original metafile format used by graphics programs was based on the use of graphics "layers". Each layer stores shapes, fonts, and colors and is often associated with a specific coordinate space. Mappers are used to convert the logical coordinates that define the data contained in a layer into physical coordinates to expose the stored shapes, fonts, and colors. Vectors have a more complex coordinate system than a Mapper (and are, in effect, a Mapper). But vector images can be rendered to other formats, if needed, because their data is defined with a coordinate system that is naturally independent of the coordinate system of the target format. The Mapper can use the defined coordinate system, however, and preserve the shape, font and color of the original image. Vectors can store specific shapes, fonts, and colors within their layers. This is the "vector arts" aspect of vectors. There is also another related concept of "raster image" (or "bitmap"). The data for a raster image is stored as a sequence of 0s and 1s. A raster image can expose its shape, fonts, and colors (in black-and-white) and also has a coordinate system that is independent of the coordinate system of the image. It is used to store graphics. There are vector graphics formats that can store vector graphics as raster images. This can simplify the storage of vector graphics, because it does not require a mapping process to convert them to raster images. The difference between vector image formats is that the vector image stores shapes, fonts, and colors. It has a coordinate system that is based on the physical coordinate system of the displayed image. It is seen as a simple 2D image. A vector image can be defined with a specific shape that does not depend on a particular coordinate system, so it can be mapped to other coordinate systems. There are many other more specialized vector formats: for example, they can store colors in a
